NOTES DE PRODUCTION

AUX ORIGINES DU PROJET

Pour FALLING (2020), son premier long métrage, Viggo Mortensen, acteur nommé à l'Oscar, s'est souvenu des sentiments que lui avaient inspiré la disparition de sa mère pour raconter un drame familial autour des rapports complexes entre enfants et parents. L'occasion, également, de montrer comment ces relations peuvent se tendre quand on ravive d'anciennes blessures narcissiques, mais aussi qu'il existe des moyens de panser ses plaies. Avec JUSQU'AU BOUT DU MONDE, Mortensen s'inspire là encore de sa mère, même s'il s'agit cette fois d'un western.

« L'idée de ce film est née d'une image de ma mère », indique le réalisateur. « J'ai conservé des livres illustrés des années 30 qu'elle lisait quand elle était petite – des récits d'aventures et des histoires de chevaliers qui se passaient au Moyen-Âge. Elle a grandi à proximité de forêts d'érables dans le nord-est des États-Unis, près de la frontière canadienne, j'avais l'image d'elle, enfant, en train de courir dans la forêt – et je m'étais imaginé qu'elle était l'un des personnages de ces vieux livres qu'elle lisait. C'est l'image de départ que j'avais en tête quand je me suis mis à écrire le scénario de JUSQU'AU BOUT DU MONDE pendant le confinement, au moment de la pandémie de Covid, au printemps 2020 ».

À ce moment-là, Mortensen s'est demandé ce qui avait pu arriver à la femme qu'est devenue cette petite fille et il reconnaît avoir été quelque peu surpris par la tournure qu'a pris le récit. « Je me suis dit 'pourquoi ne pas commencer l'histoire au moment où cette petite fille est désormais une femme à la fin de sa vie ?' », raconte-t-il. « Je ne saurais l'expliquer, mais j'ai eu envie, au cours de mon travail de scénariste, de comprendre comment cette petite fille si insouciance avait pu en arriver là ».

LES THÉMATIQUES

Le personnage central du film est Vivienne Le Coudy (Vicky Krieps), immigrée d'origine québécoise. Cette femme à l'esprit libre gagne sa vie en vendant des fleurs à San Francisco. De manière impulsive, elle décide de changer de vie en faisant la connaissance de Holger Olsen (Viggo Mortensen), lui-même d'origine danoise, garçon aussi farouchement indépendant qu'elle. Épris l'un de l'autre, ils mènent ensemble – au départ – une vie paisible à Elk Flats, dans le Nevada, petite ville de l'ouest américain où Olsen a élu domicile.

« Dans cette histoire, Holger rencontre Vivienne qui lui ressemble un peu – c'est une femme résolument indépendante, aussi têtue que lui, et qui ne compte que sur elle-même », note Mortensen. « Elle est parfaitement capable de vivre seule et de s'en sortir sans l'aide de qui que ce soit. De manière sans doute inattendue, ces deux êtres se retrouvent attirés l'un par l'autre, et ils décident de vivre à deux sans savoir ce qui les attend... »

Ensemble, ils s'inventent une sorte de petit paradis champêtre, même si Vivienne, animée par une énergie sans faille, pousse Olsen à se montrer un peu plus entreprenant. « Cet homme a beaucoup voyagé, mais il apprécie l'ouest des États-Unis et il y a trouvé son port d'attache », reprend le réalisateur. « Il s'est si bien adapté qu'on pourrait presque dire qu'il s'agit d'un cowboy scandinave. Solitaire par nature, Olsen est un honnête charpentier et écrivain – et ancien soldat –, mais il peut avoir l'air un rien paresseux parce qu'il a tendance à ne faire que ce qui lui plaît et à ne pas se préoccuper d'argent outre-mesure ».

Leur existence paisible est brutalement interrompue lorsque Olsen décide de s'engager dans l'armée aux côtés de l'Union peu de temps après le début de la guerre de Sécession. Désormais livrée à elle-même, Vivienne doit affronter les hommes sans scrupules qui ont pris le contrôle de la ville, à l'image du brutal William Jeffries qui jette son dévolu sur elle avec beaucoup d'insistance. Un incident violent se produit alors, bouleversant à jamais la vie de Vivienne : quand Olsen rentre du front, elle n'est plus certaine de savoir l'aimer. Tandis que leur relation est mise à rude épreuve, ils doivent trouver le moyen d'aller de l'avant, ensemble, pour sauver leur couple.

Avec ses vastes paysages et ses décors typiques du XIX^{ème} siècle, JUSQU'AU BOUT DU MONDE adopte l'esthétique d'un western classique, même si, pour Mortensen, le film est inclassable. « C'est un western extrêmement singulier », dit-il. « À mes yeux, il y avait dans JUSQU'AU BOUT DU MONDE le potentiel de raconter une histoire d'amour originale, dans le contexte d'un genre que j'ai toujours aimé, bien que le film s'éloigne de certains codes du western qui ont été utilisés pour broser le portrait de personnages féminins ».

La productrice Regina Solórzano (SANS FILTRE, BERGMAN ISLAND) a été touchée par le scénario de Mortensen qui renouvelle délicatement le genre et, surtout, par la protagoniste à la fois attachante et résiliente. En s'associant à Mortensen et au producteur indépendant Jeremy Thomas, Regina Solórzano était enthousiaste à l'idée de produire JUSQU'AU BOUT DU MONDE avec la société mexicaine Talipot Studio dont elle est PDG.

« Cette histoire s'inscrit dans le registre du western classique, mais on peut aussi l'envisager sous bien d'autres aspects », indique la productrice. « Elle adopte les codes esthétiques du western pour évoquer un monde en pleine révolution et une femme qui, à mes yeux, est en avance sur son temps. Le film offre un point de vue singulier sur la féminité et le rôle de la femme. Ce personnage féminin refuse de se plier aux conventions sociales de son époque et choisit de vivre avec un homme qui a l'humilité et la capacité – en dépit de son propre prisme patriarcal – de respecter ce qui la constitue profondément ».

LE CASTING

Pour incarner Vivienne Le Coudy, la production a engagé Vicky Krieps dont la prestation dans PHANTHOM THREAD (2017), aux côtés de Daniel Day-Lewis, l'a imposée sur la scène internationale. Grâce à son interprétation récente de l'impératrice Elizabeth d'Autriche dans CORSAGE (2022), elle a confirmé qu'elle avait la rare capacité à camper des femmes complexes et d'une grande intelligence qui doivent se battre contre les normes et les injonctions d'une société patriarcale.

« [Vicky] possède une beauté féminine singulière qui semble appartenir à une autre époque et qui correspondait parfaitement à notre récit », relève le réalisateur. « Mais cela ne se limite pas à son apparence physique. Elle est aussi animée par une extraordinaire force intérieure qu'elle est capable d'exprimer et que je recherchais pour le film ».

L'actrice était enchantée d'interpréter ce rôle, non seulement parce qu'elle était intriguée par Vivienne, mais aussi parce qu'elle a été émue par la modernité frappante du propos. « À mes yeux, Vivienne est une messagère », signale Vicky Krieps. « Elle est porteuse d'un message d'une époque révolue depuis longtemps. Elle évolue dans un monde où l'on se bat pour un territoire, où l'on s'entretue parce que certains estiment qu'ils ont le droit de vivre n'importe où, sans se préoccuper de ceux qui étaient là avant eux. Aujourd'hui, on est censés avoir évolué, mais au fond rien n'a changé. Ce sont toujours les mêmes qui sont opprimés, et les mêmes qui sont les oppresseurs – et les oppresseurs se servent toujours de la force pour rester au pouvoir, tout simplement parce qu'ils sont les plus forts ».

« Au beau milieu de ce chaos, Vivienne est perdue, comme tout le monde, mais elle a une force en elle », poursuit la comédienne. « Non pas qu'elle soit forte physiquement. Elle témoigne d'une force différente – elle tire sa force de sa capacité à pardonner. Depuis des siècles, les femmes pardonnent les hommes pour leur orgueil ».

D'autres acteurs, aguerris ou débutants, donnent la réplique à Mortensen et Vicky Krieps, comme Solly McLeod dans le rôle de Weston Jeffries. « Weston est le type même de la brute, bien qu'il soit influencé par d'autres personnes, à l'image de son père », note McLeod. « On comprend peu à peu qu'il n'est qu'un rouage dans le système machiavélique qui a gangréné la ville ».

Le maire Rudolph Schiller, incarné par Danny Huston, est l'une des figures les plus influentes d'Elk Flats : pour lui, la ville est son fief et il est prêt à toutes les compromissions pour préserver sa place. « C'est formidable de jouer avec les codes du western parce qu'on retrouve des archétypes très forts, comme dans une tragédie grecque », s'enthousiasme Huston.

À la fois metteur en scène et acteur, Mortensen a constamment été impressionné par ses partenaires et collaborateurs. « On a toujours envie d'être surpris – par les techniciens comme par les comédiens – et, en tant que réalisateur, je suis très heureux de ce qu'ils ont tous accompli », dit-il. « Les acteurs en particulier m'ont fait des surprises – des cadeaux quotidiens, devrais-je dire – qui nous ont permis d'enrichir la narration ».

« C'est un homme affectueux, doux et d'une grande attention aux autres », se réjouit Huston. « Ce qui ne l'empêche pas d'avoir une vision précise du déroulement des scènes. Du coup, on se sent libre tout en sachant qu'on travaille dans un cadre parfaitement délimité ».

LE TOURNAGE

Pour l'essentiel, JUSQU'AU BOUT DU MONDE a été filmé en décors naturels dans le Durango, au Mexique, qui a accueilli de nombreux tournages de westerns, notamment dans les années 1960 et 1970. Quelques scènes ont aussi été tournées dans l'est et l'ouest du Canada. « On a beaucoup apprécié le Durango car il réunit toute la gamme de paysages qu'on recherchait pour ce film – les forêts, les montagnes, les déserts, les canyons », indique Mortensen. « On a parfois aménagé certains espaces à nos besoins spécifiques, bien entendu, mais le plus souvent les paysages nous convenaient parfaitement tels quels ».

En mettant au point le style visuel avec le chef-opérateur Marcel Zyskind, les chefs-décorateurs Jason Clarke et Carol Spier, et la chef-costumière Anne Dixon – qui avaient tous collaboré à FALLING –, Mortensen a évoqué l'esthétique de nombreux westerns qui l'ont marqué, s'attardant parfois sur certains détails infimes afin de retrouver l'atmosphère du Nevada des années 1860. « Quand je vois un western, je me demande notamment comment les acteurs montent à cheval », remarque le réalisateur. « Comment montent-ils à cheval, puis comment descendent-ils de leur monture ? Comment tiennent-ils les rênes ? Par ailleurs, quel est leur jargon ? Comment s'expriment-ils ? Je suis attentif à tous les détails d'époque, bien entendu, mais aussi aux décors dans lesquels les personnages évoluent. Ce sont autant d'éléments à prendre en considération ».

L'un des principaux décors du film est la modeste demeure d'Olsen, transformée dès lors que Vivienne emménage avec lui. Carol Spier explique que la maison a été construite dans un canyon difficilement accessible, mais la structure devait donner le sentiment qu'elle « a toujours été là et qu'elle se confond avec la roche ».

« Le décor évolue au cours des différentes étapes du parcours de Vivienne », ajoute-t-elle. « Quand elle débarque, Olsen y vit, seul, depuis de nombreuses années et c'est un vrai désordre ! Elle prend les choses en main et fait un grand ménage. Encouragé par Vivienne, il l'aide à planter les premiers arbres et les premières fleurs. Au cours de sa longue absence, elle entretient le jardin, qui s'épanouit, et le décor se transforme radicalement. Tandis que Vivienne est de plus en plus autonome et qu'Olsen est au front, l'intérieur et l'extérieur de la maison évoluent en profondeur ».

Zyskind a souhaité restituer la majesté des décors naturels qui lui donnaient l'impression d'être hors du temps. « On était dans un cadre primitif », estime le chef- opérateur. « C'est un site qui se distingue totalement de notre quotidien et c'est ce que je trouve merveilleux car c'est la magie du cinéma. C'est comme une machine à remonter le temps. On cherche à reconstituer une époque dans laquelle on raconte une histoire. Il faut tenir compte de la lumière du soleil du Durango, qui est quasiment omniprésente, des montagnes, des paysages. Ces décors correspondaient parfaitement au film. C'était un vrai bonheur d'y tourner ».

Pendant la prépa et le tournage, Mortensen a souvent été touché par le degré d'investissement de ses collaborateurs, bien décidés à concrétiser la vision du cinéaste.

« Ils se sont donnés corps et âme pour raconter cette histoire, et quand on écrit un projet très personnel et que d'autres s'y intéressent – qu'ils sont prêts à le lire, puis à y participer –, c'est toujours surprenant », confie Mortensen. « Je dois dire que c'est très gratifiant. Je tiens donc par-dessus tout à les remercier d'avoir accepté de s'engager dans cette aventure à mes côtés, de m'avoir permis de réaliser le film que j'avais en tête tout en respectant le calendrier. Je pense que c'est un motif de fierté pour nous tous ».

« Le premier jour du tournage, j'ai prononcé ces quelques mots qui se sont retrouvés inscrits sur la feuille de service : 'J'espère que vous allez prendre du plaisir, mais que vous ne vivrez pas trop cette expérience comme une punition' », reprend-il. « J'espère vraiment que ça a été le cas pour chacun. Je savais dès le départ que ce serait difficile, mais j'avais le sentiment qu'on allait aussi y prendre du plaisir – au moins de temps en temps. De manière générale, je crois que cela s'est vérifié ».

ON THE ORIGINS, PRODUCTION, AND THEMES OF THE DEAD DON'T HURT

With his 2020 feature screenplay and directorial debut Falling, Academy Award®-nominated actor Viggo Mortensen channeled some of his feelings about his late mother's passing into a compelling family drama about the complexities of parent-child relationships—and the ways in which those bonds can become strained by the re-opening of old psychological wounds, while offering opportunities for hard-won healing. With The Dead Don't Hurt, his second outing as writer-director, he was again inspired by his mother—although this time developing a very different kind of film in the western genre.

"This was a story that arose from an image of my mother," Mortensen says. "I have illustrated books from the 1930s that she used to read when she was a little girl, stories about knights, medieval adventure stories. She had been raised near maple forests in the northeast of the U.S., near the Canadian border, and I had the image of her as a child running around in those forests, imagining she was in one of the stories she had read in those old books. That was the initial image I had as I sat down to begin writing the screenplay for The Dead Don't Hurt during the COVID lockdown in the Spring of 2020."

At that point, Mortensen asked himself what might have happened to the woman that the little girl becomes, and he admits that he was somewhat surprised by the path the story took. "I thought, Well, let's begin the story when the girl has become a woman at the end of her life," he says. "I'm not sure why, but I decided to make a journey as a writer to learn how that care-free little girl got there."

The film's central character is French-Canadian immigrant Vivienne Le Coudy (Vicky Krieps), a free-spirited woman who makes a living selling flowers in San Francisco. She impulsively chooses a new life-path when she meets Danish immigrant Holger Olsen (Viggo Mortensen), a man as uncompromisingly self-reliant as she is. Falling in love, they pursue an initially tranquil life together in Elk Flats, Nevada, the frontier community that Olsen calls home.

"What happens in this story is that Holger meets a woman, Vivienne, who is somewhat like him— a thoroughly independent woman, as stubborn as he is, very much her own person," explains Mortensen. "She's someone who is able to live alone and solve her own problems. An attraction arises, perhaps unexpectedly, between these two people, and they decide to embark on a journey together, to join their lives and see where that takes them."

Together, they create a kind of rural idyll for themselves, with Vivienne's innate restlessness and drive gently pushing Olsen to become a more active sort. "He is a man who has travelled a great deal, but he likes life in the North American West and has put down roots," says Mortensen. "He has adapted to the point that you could almost say he is a Scandinavian cowboy. Solitary by nature, he is a respectable carpenter and a writer – as well as a former soldier - but might seem a bit lazy because he tends to do only what he likes and doesn't worry too much about money."

Their happy routine is interrupted by Olsen's decision to volunteer to fight for the Union shortly after the outbreak of the Civil War. Left on her own, Vivienne is faced with confronting the ruthless men who govern the town, including the violent Weston Jeffries, who forces his unwanted attentions on her. A violent incident changes the course of her life forever, leaving her relationship with Holger in a kind of emotional limbo once he returns home and makes a surprising discovery. Their bond is put to the test, and they must find a way to move forward together if their relationship is to survive.

With its wide-open vistas and 19th century setting, The Dead Don't Hurt has the look of a classic western, but for Mortensen, this story defies easy categorisation. "It is a very particular sort of western," he says. "The Dead Don't Hurt seemed to me to have the potential to become an unusual love story within the context of that genre, which I have always been fond of, but it clearly breaks with some of the conventional archetypes that have been used to depict female roles in that kind of movie."

Producer Regina Solórzano (Triangle of Sadness, Bergman Island) found herself moved by Mortensen's quietly revolutionary screenplay and especially its relatable, resilient female protagonist. Partnering with Mortensen and renowned independent film producer Jeremy Thomas, Solórzano was eager to bring The Dead Don't Hurt to the screen through Mexican production company, Talipot Studio where she is currently CEO.

"It is a story that falls within the genre of classic westerns, but this movie can be viewed on many different levels," says Solórzano. "It employs that surface appearance of a western to speak of a revolutionised world, of a woman who, to me, seems to be quite ahead of her time, with a different perspective of what femininity is, what the role of a woman is. She's someone who is not in service of the existing social structures, and elects to be with a man who has the humility and capacity, despite his own patriarchal code, to respect that."

To play Vivienne Le Coudy, the filmmakers turned to Luxembourg actress Vicky Krieps, whose acclaimed work in the 2017 Oscar®-winning drama Phantom Thread opposite Daniel Day-Lewis brought her international acclaim. Her recent starring performance as Empress Elizabeth of Austria in 2022's Corsage cemented her reputation as a performer with a tremendous facility for portraying intelligent, complicated women wrestling with the limitations and expectations of a male-dominated society.

Says Mortensen: "She has a particular feminine beauty that seems to be from another time, and it's perfect for our story—not just her outward appearance. She has something inside, a remarkable inner strength that she is able to transmit that is very well suited to this story."

Krieps was excited to take on the role not only because she was intrigued by the idea of portraying Vivienne, but also because she was moved by the film's striking relevance to modern life. "To me, Vivienne is a messenger," Krieps says. "She carries a message from a time that is long gone. She lives in a world where people are fighting over land and are killing each other because some people think they should live everywhere, regardless of who else is there. Today, we are supposed to have moved on and to be evolved, but nothing has changed, really. The same people are oppressed, and the same people are the oppressors—and oppressors are still using sheer force to stay in power just because they're stronger.

"In this chaos, Vivienne exists, and she's lost, like everyone is lost, but something makes her strong," Krieps continues. "It's not that she's physically strong. What she shows us is that she's strong for a different reason, that she's strong out of the act of forgiveness. Something that women have done, I think, over centuries, is to forgive men for their pride."

Joining Krieps and Mortensen as part of the film's ensemble is a gifted group of veterans and newcomers that includes Solly McLeod as Weston Jeffries. "Weston is kind of the brute, though there are other people influencing him, especially his father, and you start to realise that he's more of a foot-soldier for the greater evil that's going on in the town," explains McLeod.

Mayor Rudolph Schiller, played by Danny Huston, exerts some of the greatest influence of all in Elk Flats—he perceives the community to be something like his fiefdom, and is willing to go to any lengths necessary to preserve his position of power. "It's incredible to work within the western genre because you have strong archetypes, as in a Greek tragedy," Huston says.

Working with the cast members as both director and scene partner, Mortensen found himself consistently impressed with the work unfolding on set. "You always want people to surprise you — the crew as well as the actors — and, as a director, I am very happy with what they have done. The actors in particular have arrived with surprises – daily gifts I would say - which have helped us to better tell this story."

The actors had similarly kind words for Mortensen. "He's a very attentive, loving, gentle spirit," says Huston. "But he also has very clear intentions as to how he wants the scenes to play. So, it's a combination of feeling free but also knowing what your parameters are."

The Dead Don't Hurt was filmed largely on location in Durango, Mexico, which had hosted many western productions - especially throughout the 1960s and '70s. A few scenes were also shot in Eastern and Western Canada. "We really liked the state of Durango, as it had the variety of landscapes we were trying to find for this movie—the high country, the forests, the deserts, the canyons," Mortensen says. "We adapted the area to our specific purposes in some instances, of course, but the landscapes were generally ideal just as we found them."

In developing the drama's visual language with cinematographer Marcel Zyskind, production designers Jason Clarke and Carol Spier and costume designer Anne Dixon—all of whom had worked on Falling—Mortensen would share imagery from a wide-range of westerns he'd seen over the years, sometimes honing in on the tiniest detail to help authentically create the feeling of life in Nevada during the period when the story unfolds. "When I watch westerns, what I'm looking at, for one thing, is how do they ride?" Mortensen says. "How do they get on and off a horse? How do they hold the reins? Also, what is the vernacular, how do these people speak? All the period details, of course, and what do the landscapes look like that these people inhabit? So much to consider and explore."

One of the story's most pivotal environments is Olsen's cabin, which is transformed once Vivienne comes to stay. Spier says the modest house was constructed in a canyon that was difficult to reach, but her goal was to create a structure that "would look like it had been there forever and would kind of melt into the rocky terrain," she says.

"The place evolves through different stages of Vivienne's life," Spier says. "When she first arrives, Olsen had been living there alone for years, and it is a mess. She kind of takes over, and cleans it up. Inspired by Vivienne, he helps her plant the first trees and flowers. During his long absence, we see the place evolve as she adds to and nurtures the garden, completely transforming the place. The interior décor and the exterior of the home change significantly as she becomes increasingly self-sufficient while he is away fighting in the war."

Zyskind sought to capture the majesty of the filming locations, which felt almost as though they existed out of time. “It’s bare bones,” Zyskind says of his approach. “It’s locations that just look different from your everyday life, which I think is great because that’s the magic of filmmaking. It’s like a time machine. You try to create a little pocket of a different time and tell a story within that. You have to embrace the sun there. The light in Durango, the near constant sunshine, the mountains, the locations, everything works as it should. It’s been such a joy.”

While preparing and shooting The Dead Don’t Hurt, Mortensen frequently felt quite moved by the extraordinary level of commitment that his collaborators displayed, helping him to realise his vision for the unique movie he sought to make.

“People gave a lot of themselves to tell this story, and when you have written something that comes from inside you and other people become interested—are willing to read it, to begin with, and then say Yes, let’s see if we can do this together—it is always surprising,” Mortensen says. “It’s very gratifying, I must say. So, more than anything I give thanks for the journey that they were willing to embark on with me, and that we were able to complete it beautifully and right on schedule. I think that all of us can feel good about that, proud.

“On the first day of the shoot, I said something that ended up on the call-sheet, which was, I hope you will have a good time, but that the experience won’t punish you too much”, he adds. “I pray that has been the case for everyone. I knew from the beginning that it would be hard, but I felt that we might enjoy ourselves as well, once in a while. Generally, I think that is how it turned out.”
